I would like to see more responsiveness to the use of results budget requests that we take the time to complete in Nuventive.

The assessment process and fuss is all a bunk. But I realize we need to do this for HLC. This is a meaningless and costly process for small institutions and programs (such as those at LSSU).

We all need to know the expectations. We have done the same work multiple times under different deans. Then we are told we have done them wrong and need to start again. This is very frustrating and my commitment to assessment has declined.

Rather than a centralized software / database, leave the methods, format, reporting medium and storage location, etc., to the discretion of the departments and instructors (who, after all, are in the best position to know what is useful to them; it's always alleged that the entire activity is pursued at all in order to benefit performance in the individual courses and programs, not primarily for some wider or external audience desiring uniformity of reporting formats and central storage).

Assessment targets seem random and little feedback is given by administration. It would be nice to have systematic targets across disciplines and regular feedback on the results of assessment.

Bring in monkeys to teach. Education is going downhill by your constant over control-Make Orwell Fiction again and get a life HLC and leave teaching to people who can do something besides paper shuffling.

Things that could be improved are helping faculty understand how to make assessment meaningful versus just a task that has no implication to them besides a checklist. I think some assessments are mostly part of a grade which help with participation. I know other non graded assessments can be viewed as voluntary, having less participation and meaning to students. How can we bridge the gap and have a mixture of both formative and summative assessments as part of our process without making it extra.

As I am still relatively new to the academic environment, I seem to be in the process of learning what I still do not know in terms of assessment.

I think we are too focused on assessment at this university. Assessment is very important, but it should be done more "nimble" and we should have a greater focus on instruction and course design. We should spend more time thinking about how to give our students high quality, possibly interdisciplinary, learning experiences and less time assessing the job we're currently doing. Assessment is important. Education is the goal.

Using internally developed software may help as long as it is user-intuitive (does not have much of a learning curve). Right now I think repetition and a stable process would help our area the most in terms of the assessment cost-benefit.

I think we could get rid of the meaningless comparison of single number datapoints that seems to pervade the LSSU assessment culture, and get back to doing meaningful assessment about what actually happened and what we are going to do about it. Getting rid of the TracDat system and going to a PDF based collection of data would help with this alot.

Personally, I think TRACDAT is a major waste of time, if I am allowed to be honest. We spend multiple hours putting data in TRACDAT and really means nothing. For example, 76% of students earned full credit on problem 4 from the final exam which maps to objective 6 in the class. So what? Was problem 6 multi-step meeting more than one objective, was it easy verses hard or anything. It seems to me that we do this only to put a check mark down for completing the assessment activities. Additionally, how do you compare Fall 19 to Spring 20 data? Spring is a very unique semester, so comparing those without context is useless.

1. Nuventive Improve is an inefficient platform--to teach a new faculty member how to enter data for courses required a 30 step process (each step was listed out--I have it documented); I recommend that the University look for another assessment platform
2. I have developed an approach to assessment which I found useful--it involves having a student observer (SI) give feedback on each class session. I found it very helpful in improving teaching. However, I have been informed that the budget will no longer permit it--which raises questions about LSSU's institutional commitment to meaningful assessment to improve teaching
3. With regard to program level assessment, I have requested multiple times that my program undergo an external review by qualified reviewers in my discipline. Despite the fact that HLC recommends external reviews, I have never received an affirmative response to proceed with this process. I have written two program reviews in the past 5 years. In the absence of recommendations from an external reviewer, I and my colleagues have made recommendations for program improvement and received minimal response. In sum, my experience with Assessment is that it is not being used as a vehicle for meaningful improvement in instruction or programs. Instead, the the "boxes are checked" and reports archived for our external accrediting body (HLC)

Now that we have worked with this tool for a few years, it might be helpful to go back to the beginning and review all the features the product has to offer.
